Sleep and Memory

Sleep researchers have found that rest plays an active role in learning. During sleep the brain reorganizes information gathered during the day and strengthens some memories. Students who review material and then sleep often remember more than those who remain awake for long periods. In practical terms, sleep helps consolidate information learned earlier. However, sleep cannot replace studying, and very short sleep may reduce attention the following day. This limitation is important because sleep supports learning but does not eliminate the need to study. For that reason, researchers therefore recommend regular study combined with sufficient sleep rather than last-minute all-night study sessions.
