Reusable Packaging

Some delivery companies are testing containers that customers return after use. A reusable container may replace many single-use packages if it survives enough delivery cycles. Collecting, cleaning, and transporting returned containers also use energy and money. In practical terms, reusable packaging works best when containers are returned many times. However, the environmental advantage therefore depends on high return rates and efficient local cleaning systems. This limitation is important because a reusable system can fail if return rates are low. For that reason, companies are experimenting with deposits and convenient collection points to encourage customers to return packaging.
