Coral Restoration

Marine biologists are experimenting with ways to help damaged coral reefs recover. Some projects grow small coral fragments in nurseries and later attach them to reefs. Restoration may increase coral cover in selected areas but cannot remove major threats such as extreme heat or polluted water. In practical terms, restoration can help specific reef areas but does not replace broader environmental protection. However, scientists therefore combine restoration with efforts to protect water quality and reduce local stress. This limitation is important because coral planting alone cannot solve every cause of reef decline. For that reason, they also monitor which coral varieties survive best under changing conditions.

9. What is the main purpose of the passage?

- B. Explain what coral restoration can achieve and why it has limits
