Wildlife Corridors

Roads and buildings can divide natural habitats into isolated areas. One important reason is that wildlife corridors connect these areas and may allow animals to move between feeding or breeding sites. In addition, a corridor that is too narrow, poorly located, or frequently disturbed may be used less than expected. Researchers therefore note that wildlife corridors can reconnect habitats when they are carefully designed. Nevertheless, planners therefore study animal movement before deciding where a corridor should be placed. The issue is not simply whether the approach has value, but under which conditions it works best. In particular, corridor design must reflect the behavior of target species. For this reason, effective corridors are designed for the needs of particular species rather than treated as simple strips of green land.
