Precision Agriculture

Farmers are using sensors, satellite images, and gps-guided equipment to manage fields more precisely. This development is often justified by the fact that instead of applying the same amount of water or fertilizer everywhere, they can adjust inputs according to local conditions; moreover, this may reduce waste and improve yields, but the technology can be expensive and requires reliable data. Taken together, these points suggest that precision agriculture can tailor farm inputs to local conditions. Yet the apparent advantages should not be treated as automatic, because small farms may benefit through shared services rather than owning every device themselves. A careful interpretation therefore requires attention to the conditions under which the method is used. In particular, precision tools may be accessed in different ways depending on farm size. Consequently, the broader goal is to make decisions at a finer scale within each field.

9. What is the main purpose of the passage?

- A. Explain how precision agriculture changes farm management
- B. compare two unrelated technologies without reaching a conclusion
- C. argue that precision agriculture should be avoided in every situation
- D. describe only the historical origins of precision agriculture

- A. impossible to measure
- B. unrelated to the subject
- C. changing without any pattern

- A. Precision tools may be accessed in different ways depending on farm size.
- B. The author believes that one simple action can solve every related problem.
- C. Further planning or evaluation is unnecessary once the approach is adopted.
- D. The approach described has no costs or disadvantages.

13. Which statement best reflects the author's view?

- A. The subject is useful only because it is inexpensive.
